How did Facebook get the decision wrong?

Again, I replied to individual statements that turned news articles into absolutes. My metaphor with the parrot was to clarify the observed mindset.

As I replied to one person directly, I also replied to another person believing that his individual rights are "more important than anyone's life".

I also suggested, that they could join each other in their mindset.

Protecting people screaming "harassment" as soon as they run out of arguments by punishing those calling them out and proceeding to remove their comments is not o.k.

We have a global pandemic (of which my wife just about died and is still suffering the aftermath) and anyone casting doubt upon - scientifically -proven actions to curb the spread of this virus is a problem to society as a whole - not part of the solution. It entices demonstrations endangering lives (as seen in Leipzig, Germany, where 20.000 + "alternativ thinkers" without masks or social distance were yelling and screaming for their "personal rights").

Instead of removing remarks from people designed to defending lives, perhaps FB should challenge the spread of "absolute opinions" without scientific basis.

Does this content involve important social issues?

It is important for our society to distance itself from opinion- and newsmedia-based "facts". Science and review should be the order of the day.

Is there anything else you think the board should know?

If sarcasm is implied - then not by the definition to hurt someone's feelings but by the definition to criticize something in a humorous way - to make a point.
